This mid-block 2 story, 3 bay residence is faced in common Flemish bond brick and capped by a hipped, shingle roof.

Three brick steps lead to the central entrance. The paneled wooden door is enframed by wooden pilasters carrying a plain pediment. On either side of the entrance are 2 rectangular windows with 8/1 lights, brick header sills and louvered shutters. They are mounted by brick header round arches with brick header tympanums.

Louvered shutters also define the three 2nd story windows. The smaller, central, rectangular window with 1/1 lights and a brick header sill is flanked by a wider windows with 8/1 lights and brick header sills.

In the northern side facade, only the 2nd story windows are visible. These are rectangular with brick sills, The light arrangement is not discernible.

A wide brick chimney on the right side of the house rises above the roofline.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Twentieth-century American domestic architecture has been inordinately influenced by the late 19th century Georgian Revival Movement. The plain lines of this house are relieved by the Georgian entrance and window composition.

Houses like 3210, in turn, effected the appearance of the massive numbers of post-war Baltimore rowhouses that emerged in response to the 1950's population explosion.
